THE CHILDREN'S CORNER

By Mrs. N. K. Wood

THE LOST CHILD

One bright Saturday afternoon two teachers in Centenary College chaperoned a crowd of youngsters of the primary department on a stroll to the woods to gather wild flowers or chestnuts or anything in the woods. There were about thirty in number, and as they scattered about in various directions they were charged not to get out of hearing of the main road at the foot of the hill, where all should meet to start home. The afternoon went all too soon. The signal for gathering for a homeward march was given.

Three girls who had gone together over the hill to the big pond came running wildly toward the crowd, crying out:

"Oh, Miss Ruth! Coulter has gone the other way. She wouldn't come with us. We couldn't make her come. She's gone deeper in the woods."

Now they were panic-stricken, for the sun was low in the west, and no one lived in that part of the country. The big forest trees were the only shelter. Those children and teachers went in different directions, calling wildly, with no response. At last all came back to the starting place, each with no avail. As all stood round the teachers crying and frightened there was a look of hopeless agony on every face.

Coulter was the little sister of Miss Ruth, and how could they leave her in the wood all night? The last ray of sunshine was fast fading away. The elder teacher said:

"Let us all pray and then divide into two companies."

They all knelt a few minutes in prayer that God would let us find Coulter. The companies were not out of sight of each other when one in advance screamed out:

"Yonder she comes!"

And sure enough, there she sat perched up on a high load of railroad cross ties. Some men were cutting down trees two miles away. Having finished their day's work they loaded their tools and men and were starting to town when the little lost child straggled into their midst and said:

"Do you know where Cleveland is?"

"Yes, child."

"Well, won't you take me home, 'cause I'm lost."

So she was gallantly driving into a safe harbor. She joined the little party of anxious friends, and they all walked home with thankful hearts and a lesson learned:

"When he shall call I will answer. I will be with him in trouble and deliver him."

A SCENE ON COALHULLA CREEK

During the Civil War, when the whole United States was the scene of confusion and danger, a small family found refuge on a little farm a few miles from town, and in a very deserted part of the world. All the men were in the army and only women and children and a few old men were left to guard the premises. Occasionally you would find a faithful negro who stayed by his master.

After the new wore off the young refugees began to feel very lonely. They tried to mix up in a friendly manner with the natives, but they were distant and not inclined to go half way. The mother managed to organize a little Sunday school. There were a half dozen families within the range of a mile or two, so a very nice little crowd gathered on the appointed day, and little Mother Refugee was installed superintendent. She took down all the names of those present and when finished she called the roll. There was a large family of Bargers. Moses gave his name first, so she wrote M. Barger. The next was Mathew, so she wrote again M. Barger; then others. Again Malinda Barger; she wrote M. Barger. Then Margaret was M. Barger, and again Martha Barger was written M. Barger.

When she began to call the roll the M. Bargers were so abundant that the dignity of the occasion broke out in a giggle. So they were told to respond according to their ages until the roll could be revised.

An old deaf lady came in while little Mother Refugee was leading in an opening prayer, and to be very social she began to say, Good morning, good morning, and bobbed round with her walking stick to a front seat. There was giggle No. 2, but quiet was restored and nothing of note transpired, but school closed to meet again the following Sunday.

Dear little mother! She didn't reprove brother and I for our fun

I LIKE THANKSGIVING

By Katherine Haviland Taylor
I like Thanksgiving a lot
(The bay before especially),
When the cooking smells and the kitchen's hot,
And mother says to me:
"Now if you stay you musn't touch.
I've only made one pumpkin pie;
I wonder whether Lucy'll come.
My, how the time does fly."

I like the little cans of spice,
The noisy whirring of the beater,
When it fluffs the eggs so high
and nice.

And mother asks me, "Sweeter?"
And then she gives me, off a spoon,
Just a little, weeny taste,
And says, "My, my, how times does fly!
It's two. I must make haste.

Some times she gives some dough
to me,
And says, "Now do run off and play."

But I like to cook, to help, to see,
So I don't stay long away.
Then mother says, "You back again.
Well, sit down by the table."
And so I do and really help
As much as I am able.

at her expense, but she persevered with her little band, and doubtless she is now reaping the reward of the faithful servant of her loving Father.
